No matter how many times a 500+ page book is proofread, by both humans and computers, it's inevitable that a "few" typographical errors will slip past and make it into the book's final printing. It's a little embarrassing, but I think it's best to admit it, rectify the error, and move on.

As I pointed out in the beginning of the book — any typos you may find were the result of one of the cats jumping on the keyboard — that's my story and I'm sticking to it.

Page 2: Should read "Chapter 12 – A Few Last Words…: I'll summarize what we've learned, and potential next steps that you can take to continue your first day cover exhibiting journey."

Page 9: Should read "I firmly believe in studying the past to better understand the present."
